Diametric Gradient Our brains are wired to make sense of the world around us. Certain regions of the brain are activated in response to recognizing the features and boundaries of objects and other objects. In the 1890's German neurologist, Carl Wernicke, first described a "blind" patient whose condition led to a distinctive visual syndrome of agnosia (meaning "without sense"). Wernicke's patient was unable to identify and describe objects such as fruits and vegetables. In addition, when a picture of a banana was viewed he was unable to distinguish which side had the peeling. In 1929 another German neurologist, Friedrich von Wegner, theorized that there was a loss of the ability to recognize that different types of objects had different shapes. He coined the word "diametric heuristic" to describe this process. The "diametric heuristic" is our brain's ability to create coherent shapes in our minds by applying rules. For instance, seeing a rectangle is important for us to be able to recognize the shape of the rectangles of pictures. The more of a rectangle that we see, the more likely we are to recognize the shape and be able to tell what is inside. In an experiment conducted in 1948, which his colleagues called the "triangle test," von Wegner asked different people to draw the same size triangle. Then he showed them other triangles and asked them to compare the shapes. His findings were startling. Participants consistently drew a smaller shape than what they had drawn. This shows that there was a loss of ability to recognize the shape of the triangle, even though it was a similar shape. The bigger the difference between the two shapes, the harder it was to recognize the difference. This is the basis of the "diametric heuristic" that we use to form shapes and to compare shapes.

Visualization of diametric gradient. Graphic created with Pajek. In the late 1800's, British physician William Bowman discovered that people with visual problems tend to confuse size with shape. At that time he found that this was most evident in people with blindness. As our eyes age, we gradually lose the ability to see fine features such as fine lines, leaves
